Those same comments insist that the states issue is simply a misunderstanding based on a poor education. FTQ and FTND scores have been found to show statistically significant associations with biochemical measures related to the quantity of cigarettes smoked plasma nicotine, plasma or urinary cotinine, and expired CO and are also associated with cessation outcome in trials without nicotine replacement therapy FTND scores from population-based samples of smokers are statistically significantly lower than scores from smokers seeking cessation help. A small fraction of active cigarette smokers are known as chippers or nondependent smokers, defined as smoking five or fewer cigarettes per day. Compared with regular smokers, chippers were found to extract similar amounts of nicotine per cigarette and to exhibit similar elimination half-lives of nicotine but to be statistically significantly less nicotine dependent and to have begun their smoking careers significantly more slowly. Regular smokers scored higher on pharmacologic smoking motive factors, and chippers scored higher on nonpharmacologic smoking motive factors. Chippers and regular smokers both appear to smoke for affect management; however, unlike regular smokers, chippers do not crave cigarettes and exhibit lower levels of smoking for stimulation and smoking to relieve negative affect.
